

Nancy I. McKeon

Nancy I. McKeon has extensive experience helping leaders design and direct strategy; implement complex, broad reaching change initiatives; shape and carry out high impact leadership engagement and communication; and build performance environments. One theme that cuts across her work is effective leadership, including analytics and metrics.

Nancy has been in consulting for over twenty years. She has served corporate clients across many industries and markets as well as not for profit cultural and service organizations. At McKinsey & Company, Inc., she worked on an internal research project to identify the defining elements of high performance leadership and was an original member of the Firm's change center. At Mercer, she led the effort to create intellectual capital on leading and communicating change and ran a new practice in large-scale change implementation.

Since her life in large global consulting firms, she was president of a startup sales consultancy for five years and continues to work with sales teams on performance initiatives and capability building. Currently, she and a partner are launching a proprietary methodology for helping companies return to (top line) revenue growth through innovation.

With Bill Geller, of Geller & Associates, she has worked on strategy for the Regional Community Policing Institutes under the direction of the COPS Office. In addition, she helped create a Geller & Associates design for a university-based law enforcement leadership academy for Jeremy Travis, President of the John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

Nancy has authored business articles and led sessions at several national conferences. She holds a Ph.D. in English Literature and taught briefly at the university level before becoming a management consultant. Nancy resides in Chicago Illinois.
